This presentation will summarize two recent studies from the literature and three presentations from the 2014 NMPHA Conference, all of which address the significance of various aspects of CBPR. The articles emphasize community advisory boards and the importance of involving parents in obesity prevention studies with pre-school age children in order to influence behavior. The presentations include the following topics: culture-specific research frameworks, promises and agreements, and community asset mapping. With a background in Community and Regional Planning, Mrs. Tobias will also reference community action planning as a tool that can be utilized in the beginning stages of CBPR.
